DRUPPY

"Hey, Little Quacker!" called Barney Bear. "How about me telling your fortune?"

"It will have to be cheap, Barney," said the little duck. "I don't have any money!"

"Don't worry about that. I'll give you a free fortune!" replied Barney.

Little Quacker sat down on a stump. The bear read his palm, and then he pulled out a crystal ball and gazed into it.

"Hmmm!" he said. "Today you are due to help someone. And that someone will be of great help to you, too!"

"Who?" asked Little Quacker eagerly.

"The crystal ball doesn't say!" answered Barney soberly. "That is all!"

"Thanks, Barney," said Little Quacker.

He walked into the woods, looking for someone to help. He didn't look long.

"Bawww!" someone was crying.

Little Quacker stopped; then he saw a baby squirrel trying to climb a big tree. It would manage to get up a few inches, then lose its grip and fall to the ground.

"What's the matter, li'l fellow?" asked Little Quacker. "Can't you climb the tree?"

"N-no!" sobbed the squirrel. "I've been trying all morning!"

"Poor little guy!" mused Little Quacker. "He must live in that tree and can't get back to his home. I'll help him up."

Then to the baby squirrel he said, "Here, li'l fellow. Grab hold of my feet, and I'll fly you up into the tree!"

The squirrel did, and after a good deal of wing-flapping, Little Quacker became airborne. "How high do you want to go?" he asked, not looking down.

"To the top!" answered the squirrel.

Up they went! Little Quacker left the squirrel on a topmost limb. Suddenly a very loud scream came from below.

"Somebody else needs help," thought Little Quacker and down he flew . . . to face an angry mother squirrel.

"What's the idea of taking my baby up into that tree?" she demanded.

"Wh-why," Little Quacker faltered, "I — I thought he lived there. I took him home!"

"HOME? He lives down here! We're ground squirrels! You better bring him right down!"

Little Quacker flew up, and told the baby to climb on his back. The squirrel did as he was told, and down they went!

For some reason, the baby squirrel was heavier going down, and the little duck had to flap his wings desperately to keep from plunging to earth.

Little Quacker landed with a THUD, but luckily the squirrel was unhurt.

"I ought to whack you good, Duck," said the mother, grabbing her baby. "Maybe next time you'll mind your own business!"

"Boy," sighed Little Quacker, "Barney was sure wrong. I tried to do somebody a favor and all I got was a bump on the ground for trying. Hummph!"

Just then Barney came around the bend of the path, carrying his crystal ball.

"Hey," he yelled. "How about me telling you another free fortune, Little Quacker?"

"No thanks," replied the little duck. "I just learned that free fortunes don't work out! I'll have to wait until I can pay you before I have my fortune told again!"
